On

Disarmament: Fresh Answers to Old Questions

Thursday, 30 October 2008

10:15 a.m. – 12:15 p.m.

in

The Dag Hammarskjöld Library Auditorium

“Let us call a truce to terror. Let us invoke the blessings of peace. And as we build an international capacity to keep peace, let us join in dismantling the national capacity to wage war.”

Former President of the United States, John F. Kennedy United Nations 1961

Background Information

Recently, UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon noted that disarmament had remained “only an aspiration, rather than a reality” despite the fact that the world had been pursuing the issue of general and complete disarmament for many years, supported by every Secretary-General, hundreds of UN resolutions and the endorsement of all Member States. Why then, despite the fact that disarmament remains one of the most serious challenges to international peace and security are Member States still at odds on key issues such as negotiating a nuclear-weapons convention or an Arms Trade Treaty? Why do states that have no such weapons still face dangers from the use or threat of use of nuclear weapons? What is holding up the CTBT [Comprehensive Nuclear-Test-Ban Treaty] from coming into force, or a fissile material treaty from being negotiated? On a more positive note, what made progress possible on landmines and cluster munitions? And, most importantly, what can civil society do to ensure that disarmament advances?

The Secretary-General has noted, “when disarmament advances, the world advances.” This meeting will be a good opportunity to explore where things stand and what is needed to get a fresh start not only on disarmament but on strengthening the UN system of international peace and security as a whole.
